

News Release

V&A to stage major medieval embroidery exhibition, with treasures returning to England for the first time since the Middle Ages

Opus Anglicanum: Masterpieces of English Medieval Embroidery

Support generously provided by The Ruddock Foundation for the Arts

1 October 2016 – 5 February 2017

vam.ac.uk/opus | #OpusAnglicanum

This October, masterpieces of English medieval embroidery from the V&A's world-class collections will be displayed, together with works returning to England for the first time since they were created in the Middle Ages, in what will be the largest exhibition on the subject in half a century.

Opus Anglicanum: Masterpieces of English Medieval Embroidery will display over 100 exquisite hand-made objects associated with some of the most notable figures of the Middle Ages, from Edward I and his Queen Eleanor of Castile to Edward the Black Prince and the sainted martyr Thomas Becket. Latin for 'English work', the phrase 'opus anglicanum' was first coined in the 13th century to describe the highly-prized and luxurious embroideries made in England of silk and gold and silver thread, teeming with elaborate imagery. The V&A holds the largest collection of these works in the world and the exhibition will shed significant new light on the tools, materials and makers behind these sumptuous embroideries, many of whom were women based in the City of London – medieval England's creative hub.

From the 12th to the 15th centuries, England enjoyed an international reputation for the quality of its luxury embroideries, which were sought after by kings, queens, popes and cardinals. The exhibition will present an outstanding range of rare, surviving examples – both ecclesiastical and secular – from this celebrated period in England's artistic production, to highlight their exquisite craftsmanship and to explore the world in which these works were created.

Magnificent embroideries, the earliest a seal-bag dated to 1100 - 1140 made to contain the seal from a foundation document of Westminster Abbey, will be displayed alongside related works in other media from the period, including panel paintings, manuscripts, metalwork and sculpture to show connections in artistic production.

Glyn Davies, exhibition co-curator, said: “As a historian, the opportunity to see all these objects, normally scattered across museums and cathedral treasuries in Europe and North America, together in one place is thrilling. We are grateful to all lenders that have generously agreed to loan works for this exhibition. England enjoyed an international reputation for the quality of its embroidery. This exhibition shows English art on a European stage.”

Clare Browne, co-curator and textiles specialist, continued: “The exquisite attention to detail in these embroidered works makes them not just impressive examples of craftsmanship and luxury materials, but vivid glimpses of life both in reality and in the medieval imagination. From the grim torture of martyred saints to a mother’s tender swaddling of her new-born baby, scenes are depicted with a meticulous precision that the sophisticated embroidery techniques made possible.”

The exhibition will explore the different phases in the technical, artistic and economic development of opus anglicanum across three centuries. One of the most spectacular objects will be the exquisite Toledo Cope, travelling from Toledo’s Catedral Primada de Santa Maria, back to England for the first time since it was created in the early 14th century. The piece is richly embroidered with foliage, masks and birds, as well as the Virgin Mary and saints, some of which are shown trampling their tormentors.

Some of the earliest embroideries from the period survive today because they were interred during the burial rites of bishops and abbots. Highlights of these include an embroidered vestment associated with Thomas Becket, as well as other masterpieces produced for his friends and successor bishops at Canterbury. Becket’s imagery was disseminated widely, and the exhibition will showcase some of the earliest examples demonstrating the popularisation of the Becket cult. The sumptuous Hólar Vestments depicting Icelandic saints, originally from the Cathedral church at Hólar in Iceland, are early examples of foreign bishops procuring embroideries from England and will travel from The National Museum of Iceland. Objects on display will include stoles, maniples, episcopal stockings and fragments of textiles.

The exhibition will also explore Westminster and the Royal Court between 1250 and 1325. Art produced at court during this period was incredibly influential. Treasures from the V&A’s collections, such as the Clare Chasuble, commissioned by Margaret de Clare, a member of one of England’s most powerful families, will show that wealthy women were also active patrons of work of this kind. The V&A’s richly-worked Jesse Cope depicting the Tree of Jesse – a vine springing from the body of Jesse, and sheltering prophets and ancestors of Christ – will join an intricately-decorated cope adorned with statuesque saints and angels from the collections of the Vatican Museums in Rome.

The heart of the exhibition focuses on the monumental embroidery created in the first half of the 14th century, when English embroidery achieved its greatest popularity and status in Europe. On display will be some of the most complex and ambitious ceremonial cloaks ever made for use in church services. The Daroca Cope, which portrays scenes from the Creation of the World and Fall of Adam and Eve is one such unique survival, as Old Testament iconography was rarely depicted in English medieval embroidery. The cope will travel from Madrid's Museo Arqueológico Nacional.

Although documents show that many embroideries were made for secular use at the time, very few survive today as they were either worn out or became unfashionable and were discarded. On display will be a few precious survivals, some of which are linked to Plantagenet kings of England, including part of a luxurious red velvet horse trapper probably made for Edward III's Court from the Musée de Cluny. An embroidered tunic worn by Edward the Black Prince renowned for his defeat of the French army at the Battle of Crecy from Canterbury Cathedral will also feature, alongside embroidered seal bags linked to English medieval monarchs, including Edward I.

The exhibition will also explore the period from 1350 to the English Reformation of the 1530s. It will look at the damaging impact of the Reformation on English embroidery, which led to the destruction of many precious embroidered church vestments. Those that survived were either altered to suit the new religious requirements, were taken abroad or hidden by Catholic families concealing their faith. The changing religious practice and growth of interest in medieval art during the 19th century will also be explored. The movement championed by the V&A led to the rediscovery of opus anglicanum, admired for its quality and beauty. Here, a fragment of a vestment revered as a relic of Thomas Becket displayed in a 19th century reliquary case from Erdington Abbey will bring the exhibition full circle.

Opus Anglicanum: Masterpieces of English Medieval Embroidery is curated by Clare Browne and Glyn Davies with consultant curator Prof. M.A. Michael, Academic Director, Christie's Education, London and Research Fellow, School of Culture and Creative Arts, University of Glasgow.

- ENDS -

Notes to Editors

- The exhibition Opus Anglicanum: Masterpieces of English Medieval Embroidery runs from 1 October 2016 - 5 February 2017. Tickets will go on sale in July 2016. Admission £12 (concessions available). V&A Members go free. Advance booking is advised – this can be done in person at the V&A; online at vam.ac.uk/opus; or by calling 0800 912 6961 (booking fee applies).

- The exhibition is accompanied by a new publication co-published by the V&A and Yale University Press. The book is a complete introduction to the design, production and use of luxury embroideries in medieval England.
- There will be a number of embroidery-focused events, short courses and practical workshops to complement the exhibition during its run.
- The V&A holds the world's largest collection of medieval English embroidery, both on display in the Museum's Medieval and Renaissance Galleries and available for study by appointment at the Clothworkers' Centre housed in Kensington Olympia.

For further PRESS information about Opus Anglicanum: Masterpieces of English Medieval Embroidery please contact Laura Mitchell in the V&A press office on +44 (0) 20 7942 2503 or email l.mitchell@vam.ac.uk (not for publication).

A selection of press images are available to download free of charge from pressimages.vam.ac.uk

