Our afternoon tea is served on traditional British Burleigh crockery paired with antique cutlery pieces that date back to the early 1900s.

The setting for Victorian Afternoon Tea is the historic Morris Room (formerly the Green Dining Room). The Morris, Gamble and Poynter rooms formed the original V&A Refreshment Rooms, the very first museum cafe in the world.

William Morris (24 March 1834 – 3 October 1896) was an English textile designer, artist and writer. The V&A holds an extensive collection of his wallpapers, textiles and tiles. The Green Dining Room was designed by Morris, Marshall, Faulkner & Co., the decoration firm that Morris established in 1861. It was the firm’s first public commission.

Victorian Afternoon Tea is served on Fridays from 1pm to 7pm only.

The cover image was designed for the Victoria and Albert Museum by Philip Webb, Green Dining Room, c.1866.
Legend has it that Anna Maria Stanhope, 7th Duchess of Bedford, was too hungry to wait for a late dinner and she requested a selection of biscuits and cakes to be served in her dressing room. The Duchess quickly became attached to this afternoon custom and began sending invitations to her friends requesting their company to share in these niceties.

Queen Victoria learnt of this activity and also fell in love with the idea. By the late 1840s the royal household was also hosting daily tea parties which later became known as ‘afternoon tea.’

Working with renowned food historian Natasha Marks, we have endeavoured to recreate Queen Victoria’s afternoon tea. We recommend guests enjoy the menu as presented to experience the full authenticity of a Victorian selection.
